In this panel, three authors/editors of forthcoming public history collections discuss the challenge of exploring the discipline – its actors, its core practices, its boundaries – for international audiences. The participants will deal with four main issues: book format for public history audiences, core/neglected practices in public history, the future of digital public history, and the challenging internationalization of the field. Facilitator: James Gardner, U.S. National Archives Panelists: David Dean, Carleton University Serge Noiret, European University Institute
- 21 of April 2017 - NCPH annual conference, The Middle: Where Did We Come From? Where Are We Going? PANNEL: *We Interpret Our Present and Try to Share Our Past: European Public History Experiences and Projects Facilitator: Serge Noiret,

European University Institute: European Union (EU) public historians are engaged with the difficult task of producing a new public history of the traditional history of Europe and of single European Nations when EU citizens—their audience—are today facing a global crisis of the European Union project but are also the direct protagonists of such a crisis. The session presenters think that public history and a public approach to the past would foster a better understanding of the importance of the history of the European construction in the post-World War II era. Being in the middle for a EU public historian means to be able to interpret the past of single European nations within the context of EU broader identity and to communicate it to the wider possible audience. Panelists: Letters to the Italian President: From the Archives to the Screen, Teresa Bertilotti, University of Milano Bicocca Digital (Public) History Projects Devoted to the European Construction, Serge Noiret The Italian House/Museum of Joe Petrosino, An Anti-Mafia New York Police Officer, Marcello Ravveduto, University of Salerno Born in the USA, Reproduced in Europe: From American Public History to European Public History, the Corporate Field Comparative Example, Félix Torres, Public Histoire Agency, Paris Public History of the Spanish War of Independence (1808-1814), Rafael Zurita, University of Alicante

European University Institute This session is organized by the AIPH (Italian Association of Public History) and aims at engaging with troubled, conflicting, and violent pasts during the 20th century in Italy. Each presentation benefits from an interaction with local and national communities and provides local fieldworks. This public history approach to difficult pasts highlights how the latter can be (re)activated in the present, offering a new “realm of memories” in a never-ending construction of the Italian national identity. Through a public, open, and communicated approach to the past, the four presenters will foster a better understanding of the Italian 20th century violent history in an international context. Participants: Landscapes of Memory: An Italian Network of Memory Sites in an International Perspective, Mirco Carrattieri, University of Bologna - Fighting Violent Pasts and Conflicting Memories through Public History: A Museum for the History of Fascism (1915-1948) Where Mussolini was Born, Serge Noiret Building Alive Memories Allows Local Communities to Know About their History: Toponymy, a Way to Fight Back Against Mafia in Italy, Marcello Ravveduto, University of Salerno ‘A Network of Archives Against Oblivion’: Promoting Public Reflection on a Controversial Past and Declassification and Digital Access to Primary Sources for the History of Italian Political Terrorism, Benedetta Tobagi, University of Bristol.

David Dean replaced me as facilitator of the panel for which I registered my answer to his questions. This roundtable will gather a group of international public history experts to discuss the 2018 Italian Public History Manifesto, which has been translated into English to expand the debate beyond the national boundaries. The controversies triggered by the Manifesto in the Italian public history community raise some universal issues that testify to the necessity of promoting a global theoretical debate concerning the definition and practices of the field- Participants: Rebecca Conard, Coralville, IA David Dean James B.
